“Eva raised me from infancy and I spent my entire life trying to get away from Eva. However, I spent the most important years of her life trying to get close to her. Eva was probably the most misunderstood person I've yet to me. She spent her life - right up until her transition - committed to her three daughters (Helen, Belinda, Chavon), and she loved her grand children as she did her children. I spoke with her virtually everyday over the past few years and when she was diagnosed with lung cancer we spoke even more.

If there's anything thing I will always remember about Eva, it would have to be how much I hated her as a child and just how much I loved her as a mature adult. She was not a very simplistic person, in fact she was most complicated. Yet when I took the time to listen to her heart, she became the most loving, caring, giving, humble being one could ever want to know.

If Eva could describe herself to her world, she would tell you that her greatest fear was dying. It wasn't just death itself she feared, she was more concerned about her daughters. Even on her dying bed, she worried who would take care of her children. Though she believed that she never truly lived her life, she spent her life trying to ensure that her off spring had the opportunity to live theirs.

In the end, we often find that the person we thought we knew, was really not that person at all. After the death of her husband, Eva spent her everyday thinking about him. She missed him more in his death, than she allowed herself to love and appreciate him in his life.

Let's not do the same. Live today, love today, forgive today - and let tomorrow be!

Eva is at total peace NOW!

May Gods blessings be with you - now and forever.
